1938 - HENDERSON, TEXAS

The Tyler Trojans remain intact after threatening to strike prior to Friday's third game of the East Texas League championship playoff with the Henderson Oilers. Eight members of the team declare a strike shortly before the game at Henderson as a protest against an "alleged" nonpayment of a bonus. The "Tyler 8" eventually change their mind and reports to the field 30 minutes before first pitch.

League president C.P. Mosley telephones minor league czar Judge W.G. Branham who explains that any player who strikes, or refuses to play the remainder of the series with Henderson, will face a banishment of three to ten years from organized baseball.

Branham also tells Mosley that he is sending a representative to be present at all of the remaining games as a result of complaints by Tyler business manager and part-owner Bob Dashiell that "some of his players were laying down of the field."

The chastised Tyler nine returns to field and captures the league title beating the Oilers four games to three.
